Due to convenience, energy efficiency, and communication technology advances, the market share of internet telephony and its userbase keeps increasing steadily. Despite the rapid proliferation of internet telephony products, most devices used for telephony services are still compatible with existing analog telephone systems, meaning that a number of telephony devices are separated from the data networks, and are therefore unable to use communication services that require a packet data network. A typical scenario for this gap is illustrated in FIG. 1, where a user of an internet telephony device 110 currently has to switch to the phone network 120 by dialing the phone number. However, this would be cumbersome, if not impossible, for many users who do not have access to a separate line. One solution to this problem is to provide telephony service in the packet data network using a VoIP service, such as Skype™. However, in this scenario, the VoIP service needs to be downloaded to the user's device, which requires additional bandwidth on the user's data network, and might therefore be prohibitively expensive. The 500,000-strong US military is only one fifth the size of China's. The experts said a first-rank military could surpass the police force of any other country and become the most powerful institution of law enforcement in the world. "The potential role of the Brazilian army is to become the most respected, powerful and most effective police force in the world," said Guillermo Grootaert, author of the study that appeared in the French weekly journal Le Nouvel Observateur. "If Brazil wants to get a visa to be part of a global coalition of police forces, it needs to have a force that is credible," Grootaert said. The study made the country's ranking on police forces at 18th out of 193 countries, a mark that is lower than the United States, Italy and Spain, the four countries ranked just after Brazil. The study, which was
