A further univariate subgroup analysis of this finding in patients with small bowel obstruction without strangulation (n = 3580) found that a shorter time from MDG to surgery was associated with a lower risk of postoperative incisional hernia compared with delayed surgery (HR, 0.74; 95% CI, 0.61–0.91; *P* = .003). Patients with a duration of MDG under 24 hours were at a higher risk of incisional hernia compared with patients with a duration of MDG greater than 24 hours (HR, 1.49; 95% CI, 1.18–1.90; *P* = .001). !Kaplan–Meier plots for incisional hernia across subgroups defined by potential risk factors for incisional hernia. A, Incisional hernia after stoma closure in patients with bowel obstruction; B, Incisional hernia after stoma closure in patients with bowel obstruction without strangulation; C, Incisional hernia after stoma closure in patients with small bowel obstruction without strangulation; D, Incisional hernia after stoma closure in patients with small bowel obstruction without strangulation.][js020163650002]{#F2} DISCUSSION ===== We report that the risk of incisional hernia after stoma closure is highest at 3 months. Thereafter, the risk of incisional hernia after stoma closure decreases, with a risk of persistent hernia after 12 months of around 0.5%. We demonstrate that the interval from the completion of surgery to stoma closure is an independent risk factor for incisional hernia after stoma closure. This study has a number of limitations. First, this study was undertaken at a single centre and a single surgeon. The prevalence of incisional hernia varies between surgical centres and surgeons.^[@B16]^ In addition, the exact prevalence of incisional hernia at 3 months after MDG could be underestimated because many of the patients were recruited in the waiting period. Second, the type of stoma and stoma site may affect the rate of incisional
