Or is the opposite, “why would I pay so little for an insecure mortgage, especially since I can just wait for the house to be foreclosed on and sell it for a profit”? Remember this: Once the house is sold, you are left with nothing. You lose your equity. You lose the house and any reward you may have had for holding the property and waiting out the sale. And then you have the possibility of incurring additional financial burdens, such as the cost of selling, the costs of realtor fees and possibly commission for the sale, the probate fees, the costs of a Title company and attorneys, even the many other unexpected costs associated with selling. In addition, if your house sells for less than you paid, you may have a shortfall. You may have to “carry” that shortfall on your capital account. And if you didn’t have enough equity, you’ll have to borrow more money to make up the difference, which you would have to pay back if you later decide to refinance. So, if you are planning to stop and start a new job that happens to pay very well and you have a secure mortgage, it may just be the right time to buy. If you are still working and can’t afford to pay more for mortgage insurance but are worried about incurring additional expenses because you can’t afford to sell immediately, I’d suggest you wait until the mortgage insurance premium is due and purchase mortgage insurance. If you have an unsecured mortgage and are living at home with no close relatives, the equity in the house is probably “safer”. If you have an unsecured mortgage and are living with a relative, then you are a candidate for a relative to purchase the house. If you want to sell immediately, you might consider using a Realtor who has clients that have “instant access” to cash and be willing to buy the house in the name of the relative. The family member can then sign a contract right away to purchase the house. “But what about
