Here are seven of the most important tools for beginners. 1. The Direct Selection Tool The Direct Selection Tool is used to make precise selections, including the selection of individual pixels, polygons, and even channels of color data on a photo. Click and hold the tool to see an options bar of tools for making different selections. The Elliptical Marquee Tool There are different types of Marquees in Photoshop: rectangular, elliptical, and freehand. The Elliptical Marquee Tool creates an elliptical shape by drawing a line. When the line's thickness is set in the options bar, the tool's Line Cap and Line Join functions determine how the line is drawn and whether it continues its shape past the original path. The Freeform Selection Tool The Freeform Selection Tool creates unbound paths that you can then manipulate. To draw a path, simply click in the image area of the canvas. The path that you draw resembles a line or polygon depending on the tools you use. The Color Range Tool The Color Range Tool lets you select only parts of an image's color data. Using the tool, you select areas of a photo that have the same color as a layer of your image, or the colors that make up that color. It's especially useful for people who often create subtle color alterations, or who want to edit everything in a photo — the White Balance Tool can give you problems with this. Conducting research in the workplace: a survey of UK hospital staff. As research in clinical settings becomes more prevalent and the burden on hospital wards increases, it is important to establish whether the hospital workforce are prepared for this. The aims of this paper are (1) to assess the level of awareness amongst hospital doctors of available research support services and (2) to determine the barriers to and facilitators of research in the workplace. A structured questionnaire was distributed to hospital doctors (HosMed group). The respondents were asked to complete the questionnaire on-line and give comments on the survey. Questionnaires were distributed to 128 members of the HosMed group (a total of 170). Of these responses, 106 were received. The final results indicated that 76 (71%) of the respondents were not aware of any of the available research support services. The predominant reason for this lack of awareness was 'fear of repercussions'. The results showed that there were many barriers to and facilitators of research in the workplace. In conclusion, the results of this study suggest that awareness of resources and knowledge is required by the hospital workforce to enhance research capacity and increase research awareness.

Q: filter through a list based on input from a previous input I have a list of few items in an excel. I want to iterate through it and check its items. If it has an attribute I want to include it in my output. My problem is that the input in my for loop can be any attribute like string, integer, list, but the output always has to be a tuple. What I want to do is: lista = ['A', [1,2], [5], None, 'B', [7,7,6]] ans = [('1,2,5'),('7,7,6')] for each in lista: if each.has_attr('list'): ans.append(f'{each.string}') # the output has to be tuple The output should be ['1,2,5','7,7,6'] I am just starting Python and couldn't get anything to work. A: This is how you can make it work. I've used a mapping to avoid making new copies of the lists and tuples in the answer. You can always use append function if you want to append them to ans. data = [
