Its stated goals are to "support high-quality early childhood education and care in Australia, and to advocate for and improve the status and quality of such education and care." It states that its main purposes are to help "the development and spread of evidence based policy and practice in early childhood education and care"; to "support quality policy, curriculum and practice development and consultation in relation to this field"; and to "help universities, research centres and others concerned with early childhood education and care in this country to sustain and enhance their contributions to our knowledge and practice." PVEC is based in Melbourne, and is an Australian Council of Social Service-accredited not-for-profit organization. In 2007, PVEC-Dictionary was founded and is the second dictionary of early childhood education and care for the primary schools of Victoria. The organisation has drafted several models of curriculum for the primary schools, one of which focuses on the development of literacy skills in children. The first two were students from Cairo. The third was a friend from Paris who is currently in Cairo. They told me that an article was published in Egypt Today "telling Egypt not to participate in the 2014 World Economic Forum". It quoted a number of Egyptian economists stating that "Egypt cannot afford to pay a premium for collaboration with the US". An accompanying article entitled "Why Egypt should not participate in the World Economic Forum" published last week the same day as the article quoted a number of Arab intellectuals and economists supporting this statement. The published articles were in response to the fact that the World Economic Forum (WEF) has announced the theme of the upcoming conference as: "Creating a Shared Future in a Fractured World". In other words, the theme is in support of the concept of US world dominance and supremacy. However, if we look at the agenda of the WEF between d0c515b9f4

During the developing years in the early part of the last century, the first attempts at transmitting pictures via radio were made, but these attempts did not lead to any real success at the time. The first serious exploration of the potential of this transmission technology began as early as 1908, when a system of this type was developed by the Marconi Company, in England. This system was a closed system requiring transmission, in the more primitive versions, of only one or two images from a film, which was also required to be carefully prepared. The first transmission systems to be developed by this company were, however, the world's first television systems. The technology of transmitting all the electronic signals required to reproduce a television image, needed for this system to work properly, was also developed at the same time. These two developments, the transmission system and the processing and conditioning of the signals, are commonly referred to as xe2x80x9cTelevisionxe2x80x9d. The works of the Marconi Company at the time covered the entire range of radio transmission, and through the transmission of images (television) they found an outlet for the engineers to test their electronics equipment by having a picture broadcast to audience and broadcast operator on the same wavelength. Later on television systems were developed which transmitted multiple channels of images that could be broadcast or transmitted and then received and retransmitted using the television receivers and the receiver stations. Amongst these multiple channel systems were the system of the West German company I. F. Herring and the system of the Japanese company Matsushita. In order to accomplish this multiple channel transmission, the television signal was split into individual channels and transmitted. When receiving the signal, the receiver was able to select the channel which it wished to use for receiving the signal. If this was done correctly, an image was displayed on the television screen which only appeared in the channels chosen for
