Adobe Photoshop vs. GIMP Learn to use both: Photoshop and GIMP. Both are open-source, graphics editing software. Photoshop is the pro choice, but if you plan on doing graphic design, or doing prepress work, GIMP might be better for you. Both can handle graphics files, and both support layers and transparency. Adobe has a number of programs that perform similar tasks to Photoshop. These include Dreamweaver, Adobe Fireworks, and Adobe Illustrator, which are all available for free. You can get started using Photoshop for free, but you may later want a program that supports more options. GIMP's features are currently being added to Photoshop, so it can be a great second choice for those wanting Photoshop functionality without the expense of Photoshop. Photoshop vs. Photo Editing Software Photoshop is a raster graphics editor, but it does not have advanced features that allow you to manipulate file formats. If you plan on using graphics files like JPEG, GIF, or TIFF, Photo Editing Software will work just fine. Software like Photo Booth and Photoshop Elements allow you to manipulate photos, but you're not going to do anything major, like change the lighting or tilt your head while in front of the camera. Adobe Photoshop vs. Adobe Bridge If you're a graphic designer, you may not be sure where to go for finding images. While Photoshop is a great image editor, you're going to find that you're not going to use Photoshop's functions in the same way as a graphic designer. Bridge is a free utility that integrates Adobe Photoshop with stock photo websites like Getty Images and iStockPhoto. Adobe Illustrator vs. CorelDraw Adobe Illustrator is more of an animation package that uses vector graphics. If you need to create graphical elements for animation, or create vector images for use in the Adobe Creative Suite, then you're going to want to get Adobe Illustrator. CorelDraw is a vector graphics package that is also an animation package. If you're a designer who plans on using vector graphics, then CorelDraw is the program you want. Photoshop vs. PaintShop Pro PaintShop Pro is a powerful graphics software suite that includes the standard features that any graphic designer would use, such as photo manipulation, photo retouching, and graphic art creation. Photoshop has the same basic

Q: Ubuntu 16.04 - how to fix system software rendering checkbox After running latest automatic updates (including kernel updates) and rebooting the system, my system software rendering option is now checked and it cannot be unchecked (through Safe graphics mode) because of a message saying that it's not supported. I have to install the beta nvidia driver and it does work, but it has some bugs still (mostly around resizing windows and they sometimes snap back to a strange position, and sometimes windows hang for a few minutes and lose focus). Can this option be turned off somehow, to make upgrading to the final release easier? A: This is because Ubuntu 16.04 uses the mesa drivers for graphics. To be able to use the nvidia drivers, you have to update mesa, and this is done in the updates. Check it by running: sudo apt-get install mesa-utils sudo apt-get install libgl1-mesa-glx sudo apt-get install libgl1-mesa-dri sudo apt-get install mesa-common-drivers To stop the checkbox from being in use, run this command: sudo gedit /usr/share/X11/xorg.conf.d/10-nvidia.conf And change the line: Option "AccelMethod" "open" to be Option "AccelMethod" "none" Supply disruptions at India's national laboratory have forced the country to revert to Bhabha Atomic Research Center's (BARC) custom uranium metal fuel. The fuel rods were used to fire up the first three units of Kudankulam Nuclear Power Plant (KKNPP) in October this year. Indian officials, however, dismissed the situation as "trivial" and said the country would continue to use uranium oxide fuel for KKNPP. Indian Atomic Energy Minister P. Chidambaram said in a statement that the fuel rods were old, rendered obsolete and therefore "we are using the best possible uranium (oxide) that we can find." "The whole process has been completed within a week," he added. The BARC reactor, located about 100km from the KKNPP site, has produced domestic uranium oxide fuel for use by KKN
