Q: Is there a way to access the named color of a pixel in python? I am trying to access the named color of a pixel: pixel = colormap[(r1,g1,b1),(r2,g2,b2)] and using the dictionary retrived I like to access the pixel at (r,g,b) = pixel print(r,g,b) or print(r2,g2,b2) But none of the above seems to work in my case. Instead of a named color, the pixel object just returns RGB value of the pixel A: What it probably means is the color you want is in the cache. Read the note below, and then try this: import cv2 c0 = cv2.cv.CV_8U c = cv2.imread('a.png', c0) print c[(r1,g1,b1),(r2,g2,b2)] Named colors are automatically placed in the cache when you read in a file, so you won't need to worry about that. The cache isn't stored by file name so you can't easily print the colors out of a file, but you can use the cv2.imread_bgr function to get images as rgba. Q: Is It Possible To Add New Main Page In The Structure Of Wordpress? I would like to know the answer of this question. I mean, is it possible to add some new main page in wordpress root folder or child folder? A: I think you can't do that. But you can add a normal page with the title you want and as permalink /path/to/page/. This is how it can be done: 1- Create a normal page (for example: my-main-page.php) 2- Go to the Wordpress dashboard, in Appearance > Menus section, in the option 'Add a new menu item' and set the URL to /path/to/page/ (You can use the page slug instead of the URL path if you already have it). // Boost.Function library // Copyright Douglas Gregor 2001-2003. I have mentioned this elsewhere, but for those that don't know, you have these other Houses. Victors: The Capitol is represented by a House of Victors and has two Houses.
